The main goal of mercantilism, a form of economic nationalism, in any particular country was to enrich the nation by making it independent and self-sufficient, not dependent on any other country. This economic autarky is probably the single most important aspect of mercantilism, although many discussions of mercantilism emphasize its bullionism.

Mercantilism is an economic theory that advocates government regulation of international trade to generate wealth and strengthen national power. Merchants and the government work together to reduce the trade deficit and create a surplus. Mercantilism—a form of economic nationalism—funds corporate, military, and national growth. It advocates trade policies that protect domestic industries.

Mercantilism: Definition, Examples, Significance Today

World-systems theory (also known as world-systems analysis or the world-systems perspective) is a multidisciplinary, macro-scale approach to world history and social change which emphasizes the world-system (and not nation states) as the primary (but not exclusive) unit of social analysis. "World-system" refers to the inter-regional and transnational division of labor, which divides the world ...
